SECTION C: READING COMPREHENSION

Careers in music provide many personal rewards. But such careers require talent and dedication. Only a person willing to devote a great deal of time to study and practise should consider a careers in music. A young person interested in a musical career should start lessons in school or with a private teacher. After finishing high school, the students should enrol at a conservatory (specialised music school) or study music at a college or university. In addition to formal lessons, the student should practise and study independently.

Most people who study music want to become professional performers or composers. But there is a keen competition among musicians, and relatively few of them earn a living solely by performing or composing. Careers in popular music are difficult to achieve and offer little security. A rock group that suddenly becomes popular may become unpopular just as quickly. Musicians perform in orchestras or in small groups that play in theatres, nightclubs and television studios. A few with exceptional talent give also recitals of perform as soloists with orchestras and opera companies. Composers may work as songwriters or arrange music for TV shows and commercials.

Teaching offers the largest number of career opportunities in music. Many composers and performers earn a living by teaching. Music teachers must have at least a Bachelor's degree in music. Most college and university music teachers have a doctorate.

Other jobs in music include positions as church organists or choir directors. Music critics review performances for newspapers and magazines. Music therapists are specialists that work with patients in hospitals and nursing homes. These musicians use music to stimulate feelings that help patients get better. Many people make, repair, or sell musical instruments.
