SECTION : READING COMPREHENSION (10 marks)

In traditional societies in Cameroon, women play an important role in promoting unity amongst the people. Girls were generally responsible for ensuring that there was peace and harmony among brothers and sisters. They had to settle petty quarrels or, if they couldn't ask their parents for help. Polygamy was practiced in many cultural groups. In these groups, the first wife was usually the main mediator who restored peace among the wives and their husband. In some cultures, the king's sister was supposed to restore peace in the family and among the queens.

The first wife also helped to resolve community conflicts and to stop people from taking revenge. The Fulfulde called this first wife Dada Sare, the Bassa called her Kindag and the Beti called her Ekomba. Amongst the Bakossi, paternal aunts fulfilled similar roles in promoting reconciliation, while amongst the Tikar in North West Region; pregnant women were mediators in a conflict. In the land of the Mungo, people sought the mediation of women called the Kalbia. These women had supernatural powers that helped to bring about reconciliation and peace. Among the Guidar, old women called the Mazoke, kept an eye over their communities. If there was a conflict, they would summon the warring parties and question them. The people fighting were asked to drink some bil-bil together as a sign of reconciliation. They were also asked to kiss or embrace one another to seal the peace pact. The women of the Beti, the Manguissa and the Eton cultures would call a special gathering called the mbabi, to promote peace in times of conflict. They would consult oracles and invite people to drink a special drink to promote reconciliation.
